
Breton v. Commissioner of Correction

lated the ex post facto clause of the United States constitution. The legislature had passed legislation in 2011 that permitted certain inmates to earn risk reduction credit toward a reduction in their sentence, at the discretion of the respondent, the Commissioner of Correction, and that also allowed the application of that credit to accelerate the date on which an inmate convicted of certain violent offenses would become eligible for parole under § 54-125a, which, before the 2011 legislation, did not occur until such inmate completed 85 percent of his or her sentence. At the time that the petitioner committed his crimes, the 2011 legislation was in effect. Under the 2013 amendment, the risk reduction credit no longer could be applied to advance the initial parole eligibility date of a violent offender, such as the petitioner, and, thus, the petitioner was required to complete 85 percent of his sentence before he became eligible for parole, regardless of any risk reduction credit that he may have or would continue to earn. The petitioner claimed that the 2013 amendment, as applied to him, violated the ex post facto clause because it retroactively increased the amount of time that he would be required to serve before becoming eligible for parole. The habeas court dismissed the habeas petition and rendered judgment for the respondent. The court concluded that the petitioner had failed to establish an ex post facto violation because, inter alia, the risk that the petitioner would suffer increased punishment as a result of the 2013 amendment was speculative due to the fact that the award of risk reduction credit is discretionary and the fact that such credit may be revoked by the respondent for cause at any time. On the granting of certification, the petitioner appealed. Held that the ex post facto clause of the United States constitution barred the respondent from applying the 2013 amendment to the petitioner, as it created a sufficient risk that the petitioner would be incarcerated longer than he would have been under the version of § 54-125a in effect when the petitioner committed the crimes for which he was incarcerated: the 2013 amendment clearly altered the calculation of when the petitioner would become eligible for parole by eliminating the risk reduction credit from that calculation, and the respondent provided no reason to believe either that the petitioner would be denied risk reduction credit in the future or that any credit that he would earn or had earned would likely have been revoked; moreover, the undisputed testimony adduced at the petitioner's habeas trial belied the respondent's contention that the risk of increased punishment arising out of the retroactive application of the 2013 amendment was too speculative and attenuated to constitute an ex post facto violation because the award of risk reduction credit is discretionary and may be revoked by the respondent at any time for cause, as that testimony established that risk reduction credits are awarded by the respondent routinely and are revoked only for acts of institutional misconduct; furthermore, this court's conclusion that the retroactive application of the 2013 amendment to the petitioner violated the ex post facto clause was reinforced by the legislative history surrounding its enactment, which indicated that the amendment was intended to prevent the early release of certain violent offenders, such as the petitioner.

464 DECEMBER, 2018 330 Conn. 462

Breton v. Commissioner of Correction

Argued February 21—officially released December 4, 2018

Procedural History

Amended petition for a writ of habeas corpus, brought to the Superior Court in the judicial district of Tolland and tried to the court, Fuger, J.; judgment dismissing the petition; thereafter, the court granted in part the petitioner's motion for reconsideration and issued a corrected memorandum of decision, and the petitioner, on the granting of certification, appealed. Reversed; judgment directed.

James E. Mortimer, assigned counsel, for the appellant (petitioner).

Steven R. Strom, assistant attorney general, with whom, on the brief, was George Jepsen, attorney general, for the appellee (respondent).

Opinion

PALMER, J. The petitioner, Randy Breton, who currently is serving sentences for certain violent crimes he committed in 2011, brought this habeas action against the respondent, the Commissioner of Correction, claiming that a 2013 amendment to General Statutes (Rev. to 2013) § 54-125a; see Public Acts 2013, No. 13-3, § 59 (P.A. 13-3), codified at General Statutes (Supp. 2014) § 54-125a;¹ which eliminated risk reduction credit

¹ General Statutes (Supp. 2014) § 54-125a provides in relevant part: "(b) (1) No person convicted of any of the following offenses, which was committed on or after July 1, 1981, shall be eligible for parole under subsection (a) of this section: (A) Capital felony, as provided under the provisions of section 53a-54b in effect prior to April 25, 2012, (B) murder with special circumstances, as provided under the provisions of section 53a-54b in effect on or after April 25, 2012, (C) felony murder, as provided in section 53a-54c, (D) arson murder, as provided in section 53a-54d, (E) murder, as provided in section 53a-54a, or (F) aggravated sexual assault in the first degree, as provided in section 53a-70a. (2) A person convicted of (A) a violation of section 53a-100aa or 53a-102, or (B) an offense, other than an offense specified in subdivision (1) of this subsection, where the underlying facts and

Breton v. Commissioner of Correction

awarded pursuant to General Statutes § 18-98e² from the calculation of a violent offender's initial parole eligibility date, thereby requiring the offender to complete 85 percent of his definite sentence before becoming parole eligible, as applied retroactively to him, violates the ex post facto clause of the United States constitution³ because he was statutorily entitled to such earlier parole consideration when he committed the crimes for which he is now incarcerated. The respondent filed a motion to dismiss, and the habeas court dismissed the petition, concluding that the petitioner had failed circumstances of the offense involve the use, attempted use or threatened use of physical force against another person shall be ineligible for parole under subsection (a) of this section until such person has served not less than eighty-five per cent of the definite sentence imposed. . . ."

² General Statutes § 18-98e provides in relevant part: "(a) Notwithstanding any provision of the general statutes, any person sentenced to a term of imprisonment for a crime committed on or after October 1, 1994, and committed to the custody of the Commissioner of Correction on or after said date, except a person sentenced for a violation of section 53a-54a, 53a-54b, 53a-54c, 53a-54d, 53a-55, 53a-55a, 53a-70a, 53a-70c or 53a-100aa, or is a persistent dangerous felony offender or persistent dangerous sexual offender pursuant to section 53a-40, may be eligible to earn risk reduction credit toward a reduction of such person's sentence, in an amount not to exceed five days per month, at the discretion of the Commissioner of Correction for conduct as provided in subsection (b) of this section occurring on or after April 1, 2006.

"(b) An inmate may earn risk reduction credit for adherence to the inmate's offender accountability plan, for participation in eligible programs and activities, and for good conduct and obedience to institutional rules as designated by the commissioner, provided (1) good conduct and obedience to institutional rules alone shall not entitle an inmate to such credit, and (2) the commissioner or the commissioner's designee may, in his or her discretion, cause the loss of all or any portion of such earned risk reduction credit for any act of misconduct or insubordination or refusal to conform to recommended programs or activities or institutional rules occurring at any time during the service of the sentence or for other good cause. If an inmate has not earned sufficient risk reduction credit at the time the commissioner or the commissioner's designee orders the loss of all or a portion of earned credit, such loss shall be deducted from any credit earned by such inmate in the future. . . ."

³ Article one, § 10, of the United States constitution provides in relevant part: "No State shall . . . pass any . . . ex post facto Law"

466

DECEMBER, 2018 330 Conn. 462

Breton v. Commissioner of Correction to establish an ex post facto violation because, inter alia, the risk that the petitioner will suffer increased punishment, that is, a longer period of incarceration, as a result of the 2013 amendment is too remote in light of the discretionary nature of risk reduction credit and the fact that such credit, once earned, may be revoked at any time by the respondent for cause. On appeal,⁴ the petitioner renews his claim of an ex post facto violation. We agree with the petitioner that the ex post facto clause bars the respondent from applying the 2013 amendment to the petitioner, and, accordingly, we reverse the judgment of the habeas court.

The following undisputed facts and procedural history are relevant to our resolution of the petitioner's appeal. On October 27, 2011, the petitioner violated a restraining order, to which he later pleaded guilty. On December 29, 2011, the petitioner committed several additional offenses for which he was charged with two counts of assault in the first degree, one count of assault in the second degree, and one count of larceny in the third degree. On March 21, 2013, pursuant to a plea agreement, the petitioner entered a plea of nolo contendere to the assault and larceny charges, and, on August 22, 2013, he was sentenced to a total effective term of imprisonment of twenty years followed by five years of special parole. The petitioner also received a sentence of thirty months imprisonment for the restraining order violation, which term was imposed to run concurrently with the first sentence.

In 2011, before the petitioner committed his offenses, the legislature passed No. 11-51 of the 2011 Public Acts (P.A. 11-51), § 22, codified at General Statutes § 18-98e. Section 18-98e (a) provides that certain inmates who

⁴ The petitioner, on the granting of certification, appealed from the judgment of the habeas court to the Appellate Court, and we transferred the appeal to this court pursuant to General Statutes § 51-199 (c) and Practice Book § 65-2.

330 Conn. 462 DECEMBER, 2018

467

Breton v. Commissioner of Correction

were convicted of crimes committed on or after October 1, 1994, “may be eligible to earn risk reduction credit toward a reduction of such person’s sentence, in an amount not to exceed five days per month, at the discretion of the Commissioner of Correction” In addition, in 2011, General Statutes (Rev. to 2011) § 54-125a (b) provided that a person convicted of a violent crime was ineligible for parole until such person served at least 85 percent of the definite sentence imposed. The legislature amended that provision in 2011 to allow the application of “any risk reduction credit earned under the provisions of [§ 18-98e]”; P.A. 11-51, § 25; to accelerate the date on which a violent offender would become eligible for parole. Accordingly, when the petitioner committed the offenses for which he is imprisoned, earned risk reduction credit was to be applied by the respondent both to reduce the length of a violent offender’s sentence and to advance his or her initial parole eligibility date. See Perez v. Commissioner of Correction, 326 Conn. 357, 364, 163 A.3d 597 (2017) (“under the 2011 amendments, earned risk reduction credit was to be applied to an inmate’s definite sentence to advance the inmate’s end of sentence date, and the parole eligibility date calculated as a percentage of the sentence would advance in similar measure”).

In 2013, after the petitioner was sentenced, the legislature again amended § 54-125a (b) (2), this time by removing the phrase “less any risk reduction credit earned under the provisions of [§] 18-98e.” P.A. 13-3, § 59. Thus, under the 2013 amendment, violent offenders are still eligible to earn risk reduction credit to reduce their definite sentence, but that credit is no longer applied to advance their initial parole eligibility date. Consequently, when P.A. 13-3, § 59, became effective on July 1, 2013, inmates convicted of a violent offense thereafter were required to complete 85 percent of their definite sentence before they became eligible for parole. See Perez v. Commissioner of Correction, supra, 326 Conn. 365.

468

DECEMBER, 2018 330 Conn. 462

Breton v. Commissioner of Correction

In 2016, the petitioner filed an amended petition for a writ of habeas corpus, claiming that the 2013 amendment to § 54-125a (b) (2), as applied to him, violates the ex post facto clause because that amendment retroactively increased the amount of time he would be required to serve before becoming eligible for parole. At his habeas trial, the petitioner presented the testimony of Michelle Deveau, a records specialist with the Department of Correction (department), who testified that the petitioner at that time was eligible for risk reduction credit and that, as of the date of the habeas trial, had earned 158 such credits, the maximum number he could have earned at that point in his sentence. Deveau further testified that, although discretionary, risk reduction credit is awarded by the respondent routinely and that, each month, the department's computer system automatically posts it to the timesheets of eligible inmates.

The petitioner also adduced testimony from Heidi Palliardi, a supervisor with the department's Sentence Calculation and Interstate Management Unit, concerning the risk reduction credit program. She testified that risk reduction credit is governed by department administrative directive 4.2A and that, to remain eligible to receive such credit, inmates must follow all institutional rules, remain free of any disciplinary reports and comply with their individual "offender accountability plan," which is provided to every inmate after sentencing. Palliardi further explained that risk reduction credit is subject to forfeiture, after notice and a hearing, for failure to comply with any of the aforementioned program requirements. Finally, the petitioner presented the testimony of Richard Sparaco, the executive director of the Board of Pardons and Paroles (board), who explained that, under the 2013 amendment to § 54-125a

330 Conn. 462 DECEMBER, 2018

469

Breton v. Commissioner of Correction

(b) (2), “the [d]epartment . . . no longer could apply risk reduction earned credits to [advance] the parole eligibility date for anyone [who] the board has designated . . . a violent offender.” Sparaco also stated that parole is granted at the initial parole hearing in approximately 55 percent of all cases.

Following the habeas trial, the court issued a memorandum of decision and dismissed the petition. The court concluded that the petitioner had failed to establish an ex post facto violation because, inter alia, the risk that the petitioner would suffer increased punishment as a result of the 2013 amendment to § 54-125a (b) (2) was entirely speculative due to the fact that the award of risk reduction credit is discretionary and the fact that such credit may be revoked by the respondent for cause at any time. We agree with the petitioner that, contrary to the determination of the habeas court, the prohibition of the ex post facto clause bars the retroactive application of the 2013 amendment to § 54-125a (b) (2) to him.⁵

⁵ We note, preliminarily, that the habeas court also rejected the petitioner’s ex post facto claim because, despite the plain language of the 2011 amendment to General Statutes (Rev. to 2011) § 54-125a (b) (2); see P.A. 11-51, § 25; that provision did not afford violent offenders the right to apply their risk reduction credits to obtain parole consideration prior to serving 85 percent of their sentences, and because, in order to grant relief to the petitioner, the court would be required to “enmesh itself” impermissibly in “prison administration matters” Both of these reasons are devoid of merit. With respect to the court’s first reason, the 2011 amendment to General Statutes (Rev. to 2011) § 54a-125a (b) (2) clearly treated earned risk reduction credit as an exception to the requirement that a violent offender must serve 85 percent of his or her sentence before becoming eligible for parole consideration. See P.A. 11-51, § 25, codified at General Statutes (Supp. 2012) § 54-125a (b) (2) (person convicted of violent crime is not eligible for parole “until such person has served not less than eighty-five per cent of the definite sentence imposed less any risk reduction credit earned under the provisions of [§] 18-98e” [emphasis added]). Indeed, we recently made precisely this point in Perez v. Commissioner of Correction, supra, 326 Conn. 357, which was issued after the habeas court rendered its decision in the present case, in explaining the effect of the 2011 amendment to General Statutes (Rev. to 2011) § 54-125a (b) (2). See id., 364 (stating that, under 2011 amendment to statute, “earned risk reduction credit was

470

DECEMBER, 2018 330 Conn. 462

Breton v. Commissioner of Correction

Before addressing the merits of the petitioner's claim, we set forth the governing legal principles. The ex post facto clause of the United States constitution prohibits retroactive application of a law that "inflicts a greater punishment, than the law annexed to the crime, when committed." (Emphasis omitted.) Calder v. Bull, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 386, 390, 1 L. Ed. 648 (1798). In other words, the clause "forbids the application of any new punitive measure to a crime already consummated, to the detriment or material disadvantage of the wrongdoer." Lindsey v. Washington, 301 U.S. 397, 401, 57 S. Ct. 797, 81 L. Ed. 1182 (1937). Although a defendant claiming an ex post facto violation need not establish with certainty that retroactive application of a new law will result in greater or more onerous punishment, the United States Supreme Court has "made it clear that mere speculation or conjecture that a change in law will retrospectively increase the punishment for a crime will not suffice to establish a violation of the [e]x [p]ost [f]acto [c]lause. See California Dept. of Corrections v. Morales, 514 U.S. 499, 509 [115 S. Ct. 1597, 131 L. Ed. 2d 588] (1995). [Rather, the] touchstone of [the] [c]ourt's inquiry is whether a given change in law presents a sufficient risk of increasing the measure of punishment attached to the covered crimes." (Internal quotation marks omitted.) Peugh v. United States, 569 U.S. 530, 539, 133 S. Ct. 2072, 186 L. Ed. 2d 84 (2013). Put differently, the risk of an adverse impact on a prisoner's expected term of confinement must be "genuine"; Johnson v. Commissioner of Correction, 258 Conn. 804, 818, 786 A.2d 1091 to be applied to an inmate's definite sentence to advance the inmate's end of sentence date, and the parole eligibility date calculated as a percentage of the sentence would advance in similar measure" [emphasis added]). With respect to the habeas court's second reason for rejecting the petitioner's claim, although department officials necessarily have broad leeway in determining how best to administer this state's prisons, it is axiomatic that that discretion does not extend to violating the constitutional rights of sentenced prisoners, including, of course, the rights granted to such prisoners under the ex post facto clause.

330 Conn. 462 DECEMBER, 2018

471

Breton v. Commissioner of Correction

(2002); and not merely “remote” or “conceivable” California Dept. of Corrections v. Morales, supra, 508. Generally speaking, however, “[t]he question when a change in law creates such a risk is a matter of degree; the test cannot be reduced to a single formula.” (Internal quotation marks omitted.) Peugh v. United States, supra, 539.

Furthermore, “[t]he United States Supreme Court has recognized that a law need not impair a vested right to violate the ex post facto prohibition. Evaluating whether a right has vested is important for claims under the [c]ontracts or [d]ue [p]rocess [c]lauses, which solely protect [preexisting] entitlements. . . . The presence or absence of an affirmative, enforceable right is not relevant, however, to the ex post facto prohibition, which forbids the imposition of punishment more severe than the punishment assigned by law when the act to be punished occurred. Critical to relief under the [e]x [p]ost [f]acto [c]lause is not an individual’s right to less punishment, but the lack of fair notice and governmental restraint when the legislature increases punishment beyond what was prescribed when the crime was consummated. Thus, even if a statute merely alters penal provisions accorded by the grace of the legislature, it violates the [c]lause if it is both retrospective and more onerous than the law in effect on the date of the offense. . . . Weaver v. Graham, 450 U.S. 24, 29–31, 101 S. Ct. 960, 67 L. Ed. 2d 17 (1981)

“The United States Supreme Court also has recognized that [t]he presence of discretion does not displace the protections of the [e]x [p]ost [f]acto [c]lause. Garner v. Jones, 529 U.S. 244, 253, 120 S. Ct. 1362, 146 L. Ed. 2d 236 (2000). Rather, [t]he controlling inquiry . . . [is] whether retroactive application of the change in [the] law create[s] a sufficient risk of increasing the measure of punishment attached to the covered crimes. . . . Thus, unlike a due process claim, the . . . focus

Breton v. Commissioner of Correction

[of which is] primarily on the degree of discretion enjoyed by the [governmental] authority, not on the estimated probability that the authority will act favorably in a particular case . . . Giaimo v. New Haven, 257 Conn. 481, 508–509, 778 A.2d 33 (2001), quoting Kelley Property Development, Inc. v. Lebanon, 226 Conn. 314, 323, 627 A.2d 909 (1993); [an ex post facto claim’s] primary focus . . . is the probability of increased punishment.” (Citations omitted; internal quotation marks omitted.) Johnson v. Commissioner of Correction, supra, 258 Conn. 817–18.

In addition, it is firmly established that statutes governing parole eligibility are part of the “law annexed to the crime” for ex post facto clause purposes. Calder v. Bull, supra, 3 U.S. (3 Dall.) 390; see, e.g., Warden v. Marrero, 417 U.S. 653, 658, 94 S. Ct. 2532, 41 L. Ed. 2d 383 (1974). As the United States Supreme Court explained in Marrero, “[a]lthough . . . the precise time at which the offender becomes eligible for parole is not part of the sentence . . . it is implicit in the terms of the sentence. And because it could not be seriously argued that sentencing decisions are made without regard to the period of time a defendant must spend in prison before becoming eligible for parole, or that such decisions would not be drastically affected by a substantial change in the proportion of the sentence required to be served before becoming eligible, parole eligibility can be properly viewed as being determined—and deliberately so—by the sentence of the [court].” Id., 658; see Weaver v. Graham, supra, 450 U.S. 32 (“[w]e have previously recognized that a prisoner’s eligibility for reduced imprisonment is a significant factor entering into both the defendant’s decision to plea bargain and the judge’s calculation of the sentence to be imposed”).

Thus, in Weaver v. Graham, supra, 450 U.S. 24, the Supreme Court struck down on ex post facto grounds a then newly enacted Florida statute that reduced the number of good time credits an inmate could earn because the law “effectively postponed the date when [the petitioner] would become eligible for early release.” Lynce v. Mathis, 519 U.S. 433, 442, 117 S. Ct. 891, 137 L. Ed. 2d 63 (1997); see Weaver v. Graham, supra, 25–27. The court explained that the “retroactive alteration of parole or early release provisions, like the retroactive application of provisions that govern initial sentencing, implicates the [e]x [p]ost [f]acto [c]lause because such credits are one determinant of petitioner’s prison term . . . and . . . [the petitioner’s] effective sentence is altered once this determinant is changed.” (Internal quotation marks omitted.) Lynce v. Mathis, supra, 445, quoting Weaver v. Graham, supra, 32. In Lynce, the court relied on Weaver in deciding that a statute that made certain offenders ineligible to continue earning “overcrowding” credits and retroactively revoked the overcrowding credits those inmates had already earned constituted increased punishment in violation of the ex post facto clause. See Lynce v. Mathis, supra, 437–39, 442, 445–46.

330 Conn. 462 DECEMBER, 2018

473

Breton v. Commissioner of Correction

Since Weaver, federal courts uniformly have held that “it is unconstitutional to apply a statute that alters, to the defendant’s disadvantage, the terms under which eligibility for [parole] is calculated, if that statute was enacted after the date of the underlying offense” United States v. Paskow, 11 F.3d 873, 878 (9th Cir. 1993). The court in Paskow elaborated on the rationale underlying its assertion: “The [United States] Supreme Court’s affirmance of the . . . decision in Greenfield v. Scafati, 277 F. Supp. 644 (D. Mass. 1967), aff’d mem., 390 U.S. 713, 88 S. Ct. 1409, 20 L. Ed. 2d 250 (1968), makes that proposition indisputable” United States v. Paskow, supra, 878. “Although the Supreme Court affirmed Greenfield in a memorandum [decision] . . . its decision is controlling authority. Indeed, the [c]ourt has cited its memorandum [decision] with approval [in] Weaver v. Graham, [supra] 450 U.S. [34], and has described it as one of [t]he [c]ourt's precedents [id., 37]" (Citation omitted; internal quotation marks omitted.) United States v. Paskow, supra, 878.

474

DECEMBER, 2018 330 Conn. 462

Breton v. Commissioner of Correction

"In Greenfield, a defendant who was incarcerated following revocation of his parole challenged a statute that prohibited any state parole violator from receiving [good conduct] credits during his first six months in custody following revocation. . . . At the time [that] the defendant committed his underlying crime, all prisoners, including parole violators, could accumulate [good conduct] credits from the beginning of their incarceration. The new statute . . . was adopted after the defendant committed his underlying crime, but before he committed the offense for which his parole was revoked. The [three judge panel in Greenfield] held that application of the statute to the defendant violated the ex post facto clause, because the statute prevented him from being released as early as he might have been had he been permitted to amass [good conduct] credits under the statute in effect at the time he committed the underlying crime. Thus, according to the [three judge panel] and according to the Supreme Court, the statute operated retrospectively and to his detriment. As the [three judge panel] stated, the effect of the statute was to [extend] his sentence and [to] increas[e] his punishment beyond the amount he expected or had notice of when he committed his underlying crime. [Greenfield v. Scafati, supra, 277 F. Supp.] 645

"[Federal] [c]ircuit courts that have considered the ex post facto issue have, without exception, followed Greenfield, holding that the ex post facto clause is violated when a defendant's eligibility for release is adversely affected under a statute that was not in effect at the time of the defendant's underlying crime but was adopted before the defendant committed the act for which his parole was revoked.” (Citation omitted; emphasis omitted; internal quotation marks omitted.) United States v. Paskow, supra, 11 F.3d 878–79; see also, e.g., Schwartz v. Muncy, 834 F.2d 396, 398 n.8 (4th Cir. 1987) (“parole eligibility is part of the law annexed to the crime at the time of a person’s offense”); Burnside v. White, 760 F.2d 217, 220 (8th Cir.) (“[t]here is no question that a new parole statute may alter the consequences attached to a crime for which a prisoner already has been sentenced . . . [and] to the degree that a statute does so, it has retrospective effect”), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 1022, 106 S. Ct. 576, 88 L. Ed. 2d 559 (1985); Lerner v. Gill, 751 F.2d 450, 454 (1st Cir.) (“parole eligibility is part of the law annexed to the crime for ex post facto purposes” [internal quotation marks omitted]), cert. denied, 472 U.S. 1010, 105 S. Ct. 2709, 86 L. Ed. 2d 724 (1985); Shepard v. Taylor, 556 F.2d 648, 654 (2d Cir.1977) (“[s]ince parole eligibility is considered an integral part of any sentence . . . official [postsentence] action that delays eligibility for supervised release runs afoul of the ex post facto proscription” [citation omitted]).

330 Conn. 462 DECEMBER, 2018

475

Breton v. Commissioner of Correction

With the foregoing principles in mind, we must determine whether the 2013 amendment to § 54-125a (b) (2) creates a sufficient risk that the petitioner will be incarcerated longer than he would have been under the 2011 amendment to the statute. As we previously discussed, the habeas court concluded that that risk was too speculative and attenuated to warrant relief under the ex post facto clause because the granting of risk reduction credit is discretionary and the respondent can revoke those credits at any time for cause. In considering whether the habeas court was correct in its analysis, it is instructive to examine cases in which changes to parole eligibility rules were determined not to have violated the ex post facto clause on the ground that the risk of increased punishment was deemed too speculative and attenuated. The seminal case, from which the terms “speculative” and “attenuated” derive for the purpose of evaluating the scope of the ex post facto clause, is California Dept. of Corrections v. Morales, supra, 514 U.S. 508–509. In Morales, the respondent, Jose Ramon Morales, claimed that a California statute that had changed the frequency—from every year to every three years—within which prisoners convicted of more than one homicide must be reconsidered for parole violated the ex post facto clause. Id., 503–504.

As in every ex post facto case, the controlling inquiry for the court was whether the statute’s retroactive application created a sufficient risk of increasing the measure of punishment attached to the petitioner’s crime. Id., 509. In concluding that it did not, the court emphasized three points. First, the court noted that the statute applied only to prisoners who had committed multiple murders, “a class of prisoners for whom the likelihood of release on parole [was extremely] remote” to begin with. Id., 510. To demonstrate just how remote, the court took judicial notice of evidence presented in another California case that 85 percent of all California prisoners—not just those convicted of multiple homicides—are denied parole at subsequent parole hearings. Id., 510–11. Second, it was extremely important to the court that “[t]he amendment has no effect on the date of any prisoner’s initial parole suitability hearing; it affects the timing only of subsequent hearings.” (Emphasis in original.) Id., 511; see also id., 507 (noting that “[t]he amendment . . . left unchanged the substantive formula for securing any reductions to [the petitioner’s] sentencing range . . . [and] had no effect on the standards for fixing a prisoner’s initial date of eligibility for parole” [citations omitted; internal quotation marks omitted]); id., 512 (“there is no reason to conclude that the amendment will have any effect on any prisoner's actual term of confinement"). Finally, the court emphasized that the statute did not require the parole board to delay subsequent hearings by up to two years; rather, it merely gave it the discretion to do so "to avoid the futility of going through the motions of reannouncing its denial of parole suitability on a yearly basis." Id.

330 Conn. 462 DECEMBER, 2018

477

Breton v. Commissioner of Correction

Recently, in Perez v. Commissioner of Correction, supra, 326 Conn. 357, we relied on the court's reasoning in Morales in concluding that retroactive application of another 2013 amendment to General Statutes (Rev. to 2013) § 54-125a (e), which allowed the board to decline to hold a prisoner's initial parole eligibility hearing if certain conditions were met; see Public Acts 2013, No. 13-247, § 376; did not run afoul of the ex post facto clause. See Perez v. Commissioner of Correction, supra, 377–78. As we explained in Perez, "the statute in effect when the petitioner [Dominic Perez] committed his offense [provided] that the board shall conduct a hearing when a person has completed 85 percent of his total effective sentence. General Statutes (Rev. to 2009) § 54-125a (e). The 2013 amendment provide[d] that the board may conduct a hearing at that time . . . but require[d] that, in the event that the board declines to hold a hearing, it must document the specific reasons for not doing so and provide such reasons to the offender." (Emphasis in original.) Perez v. Commissioner of Correction, supra, 375–76. In reaching our decision in Perez, we likened the 2013 amendment to General Statutes (Rev. to 2013) § 54-125a (e) to the California statute at issue in Morales, observing that, as in Morales, the amendment did not affect a violent offender's initial parole eligibility date but, instead, merely permitted the parole board to delay the initial hearing, as long as the board documented its reasons for doing so. Id., 377–78. We concluded that, "[b]ecause the parole hearing provision [did] not alter the calculation of when an inmate is eligible for parole, and because the board . . . still [was required to] consider the inmate's parole suitability at that time, the elimination of a mandatory hearing in the 2013 parole hearing provision [did] not increase the punishment imposed for the petitioner's offense." Id.

478

DECEMBER, 2018 330 Conn. 462

Breton v. Commissioner of Correction

In the present case, it cannot reasonably be argued that the 2013 amendment to General Statutes (Rev. to 2013) § 54-125a (b) (2) does not "alter the calculation of when [the petitioner] is eligible for parole" Id., 377. It clearly does so by eliminating risk reduction credit from that calculation. Indeed, the petitioner has consistently earned the maximum number of risk reduction credits that were available to him, and the respondent has provided no reason to believe either that the petitioner will be denied risk reduction credit in the future or that any credit that he earns or already has earned is likely to be revoked. In such circumstances, it strikes us as quite speculative to conclude that the petitioner's release date will not be adversely affected by retroactively applying the 2013 amendment to him. See, e.g., Lynce v. Mathis, supra, 519 U.S. 444 (Morales "rested squarely on the conclusion that a prisoner's ultimate date of release would be entirely unaffected by the change in the timing of [parole] suitability hearings" [internal quotation marks omitted]); see also Weaver v. Graham, supra, 450 U.S. 35–36 (finding ex post facto violation when "the new provision constrict[ed] the inmate's opportunity to earn early release, and thereby [made] more onerous the punishment for crimes committed before its enactment"); United States v. Paskow, supra, 11 F.3d 877 (in considering whether new law violates ex post facto clause, "a court must focus on the change in the defendant's eligibility to receive a lesser sentence than a new law may permit, regardless of whether the defendant would actually have received the lesser sentence" [emphasis in original]). Under the reasoning of Morales and Perez, therefore, applying the amendment retroactively to the petitioner does not pass muster under the ex post facto clause.

330 Conn. 462 DECEMBER, 2018

479

Breton v. Commissioner of Correction

In support of his contrary contention, the respondent relies on several cases that have no material bearing on the present case because they were all brought under the due process clause. For example, the respondent cites Baker v. Commissioner of Correction, 281 Conn. 241, 914 A.2d 1034 (2007), for the proposition that “parole eligibility . . . is not within the terms of the sentence imposed”; (internal quotation marks omitted) id., 260; and that “parole eligibility under § 54-125a does not constitute a cognizable liberty interest sufficient to invoke habeas jurisdiction.” Id., 261–62. On the basis of this language, the respondent argues that “parole in Connecticut . . . is of no constitutional significance” and that “there cannot be an ex post facto violation because parole is not part of the sentence.”

In Baker, however, we took pains to distinguish the due process claim at issue in that case from an ex post facto claim—a claim that was not made in that case—stating in relevant part: “In Johnson v. Commissioner of Correction, supra, 258 Conn. 808, 818–19, this court concluded that the habeas court had jurisdiction to consider the petitioner’s ex post facto challenge to the board’s parole eligibility calculation for his sentence based on its retroactive application of § 54-125a (b) (2) and (c). We distinguished the petition in Johnson from that in Vincenzo v. Warden, 26 Conn. App. 132, 142, 599 A.2d 31 (1991), [in which] the Appellate Court had [upheld the decision of the habeas court rejecting] a due process challenge to [the retroactive application of] the predecessor to § 54-125a . . . because the broad discretion vested in the board to determine whether to consider an inmate’s parole suitability under the statute did not give rise to a cognizable liberty interest. Johnson v. Commissioner of Correction, supra, 816–17. This court explained that, [u]nlike [the petitioner in Vincenzo], however, the petitioner in [Johnson was] claiming a violation of his rights under the ex post facto clause as opposed to the due process clause. The United States Supreme Court has recognized that a law need not impair a vested right to violate the ex post facto prohibition. Evaluating whether a right has vested is important for claims under the . . . [d]ue [p]rocess [clause], which solely protect[s] [preexisting] entitlements.” (Internal quotation marks omitted.) Baker v. Commissioner of Correction, supra, 281 Conn. 260–61. Furthermore, the respondent’s assertions cannot be squared with the controlling case law previously discussed, which makes eminently clear that the rules governing parole eligibility are part of the law annexed to the crime for purposes of the ex post facto clause. See, e.g., Warden v. Marrero, supra, 417 U.S. 658.

The respondent next claims, consistent with the determination of the habeas court, that any risk of increased punishment arising out the retroactive application of the 2013 amendment to the petitioner is too speculative and attenuated to constitute an ex post facto violation because the award of risk reduction credit is discretionary and any such credit that may be awarded is subject to revocation by the respondent for cause. As we previously explained, however, the undisputed testimony adduced at the petitioner’s habeas trial belies this contention. That evidence established that, although discretionary and subject to revocation for cause, risk reduction credits are awarded by the respondent routinely and are revoked only for acts of institutional misconduct; moreover, the petitioner has earned all such credits for which he was eligible, and, to date, he has not forfeited any of those credits.

Notably, the respondent has failed to identify a single case in which a court has concluded that eliminating good time credits from the calculation of an offender’s initial parole eligibility dates did not violate the ex post facto clause merely because the credits at issue were discretionary rather than mandatory, and our independent research has not revealed any such case. This is not surprising for the reasons set forth by the Maryland Court of Appeals in Secretary, Dept. of Public Safety & Correctional Services v. Demby, 390 Md. 580, 890 A.2d 310 (2006). In that case, the court stated in relevant part: “The nature of the special project credits . . . is irrelevant for the purposes of [the] ex post facto analysis. The focus of [the] analysis is not on whether these credits were mandatory or discretionary but, rather, whether the amendments to the regulations [that provide] these credits [have] the effect of lengthening [the] respondents’ sentences and [are] more ‘onerous’ than the prior law. . . . [T]he sentences of those individuals . . . whose qualifying crimes have been changed to disqualifying crimes by the amendments, have clearly been lengthened.

330 Conn. 462 DECEMBER, 2018

481

Breton v. Commissioner of Correction

“[The court does] not find the increased punishment caused by the amendments . . . to be ‘speculative and attenuated.’ . . . [T]he case from which that language originates, Morales . . . is factually distinguishable from the present case. In Morales, the statutory change affected the frequency of parole eligibility hearings for inmates by giving parole officials the ability, after meeting several procedural safeguards, to postpone an inmate’s yearly evaluation by up to three years when potential safety issues, among other things, [are] a concern, and parole officials [believe] the inmate would not be eligible for parole during the extended period regardless. [Morales’] ex post facto claims were rejected as the chances of an increased punishment were ‘speculative and attenuated.’ [In this case, the] respondents will clearly serve a longer period of time as a result of the amendments, and the determination of that increase is far easier than in Morales.

482

DECEMBER, 2018 330 Conn. 462

Breton v. Commissioner of Correction

“Moreover . . . the language included in the regulation providing that, ‘this section may not be interpreted . . . to mean that an inmate who is eligible to receive the credits described in this section has a right to these credits or . . . will continue to receive these credits in the future,’ does not provide sufficient notice to inmates for the purposes of the ex post facto prohibition That disclaimer alone does not exempt the regulation from ex post facto scrutiny.” (Citation omitted; footnote omitted.) Id., 617–18.

The only case cited by the respondent that even arguably may be read to provide a measure of support for his position is Abed v. Armstrong, 209 F.3d 63 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 531 U.S. 897, 121 S. Ct. 229, 148 L. Ed. 2d 164 (2000), in which the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, applying the law of Connecticut, rejected a claim that a then newly adopted directive of the department disqualifying prison gang members from earning good time credits violated the ex post facto clause. Id., 66. The court gave two reasons for its decision, one of which was the discretionary nature of the credits. Specifically, the court stated: The petitioner’s “argument that the [d]irective increased his punishment by restricting his eligibility to earn good time credit assumes that before the [d]irective [General Statutes §] 18-7a (c) automatically entitled all inmates to be eligible to earn good time credit. That assumption is erroneous. Unlike the statutes at issue in both Weaver and Lynce, [§] 18-7a (c) does not automatically confer the right to earn good time credit on all inmates. Rather, the statute [provides] only that inmates ‘may’ earn good time credit . . . thereby rendering good time credit a discretionary matter. . . .

“In addition, and again unlike Lynce and Weaver, the [d]irective was not applied retroactively to [the petitioner]. No good time credit earned by [the petitioner] prior to the [d]irective was forfeited, and [the petitioner] was not classified as a [gang member] until after the [d]irective was in effect. By its terms, the [d]irective concerned ongoing and future—not past—conduct.”⁶ (Citation omitted.) Id.

330 Conn. 462 DECEMBER, 2018

483

Breton v. Commissioner of Correction

The present case is distinguishable from Abed in two crucial respects. First, it is undisputed that the 2013 amendment is being applied to the petitioner retroactively, not punishing him for acts committed while he was in prison, as was the case in Abed. Second, in contrast to the petitioner in Abed, the petitioner in the present case is not claiming a right to earn risk reduction credits. Indeed, he acknowledges that the award of such credits is discretionary with the respondent and, further, that, ultimately, his opportunity to continue to earn them is a matter of legislative grace. He claims only that the risk reduction credits that he does accumulate over the years—however few or many that may be—must be applied to reduce his definite sentence and to advance his initial parole eligibility date in accordance with the law in existence at the time of his offense, which law did not give the respondent discretion to refuse to include those credits in calculating his initial parole eligibility date. In other words, the ⁶ Other courts similarly have concluded that a statute that disqualified an inmate from earning good time credits on the basis of his or her membership in a prison gang did not violate the ex post facto clause because the statute did not increase the punishment for the original offense but, rather, constituted punishment for conduct occurring after the inmate entered prison. See Nevarez v. Barnes, 749 F.3d 1124, 1128 (9th Cir.) (holding that statute disqualifying gang affiliated inmate from receiving good time credits did not violate ex post facto clause because it did not apply to underlying offense), cert. denied sub nom. Nevarez v. Ducart, U.S. , 135 S. Ct. 295, 190 L. Ed. 2d 215 (2014); Castlin v. Lewis, Docket No. 11-CV-06694-JST (PR), 2015 WL 435456, *8 (N.D. Cal. February 2, 2015) (holding that statute disqualifying gang affiliated inmate from receiving good time credits did not violate ex post facto clause because it did not apply retroactively but, rather, was triggered by “active and continuing gang membership”); Williams v. Lewis, Docket No. C 12-2893 RS (PR), 2014 WL 988865, *3 (N.D. Cal. March 10, 2014) (same).

484

DECEMBER, 2018 330 Conn. 462

Breton v. Commissioner of Correction

petitioner is claiming a right only to the more beneficial formula for calculating his parole eligibility date, not to the credits on which that formula is predicated.⁷

Our conclusion that the 2013 amendment to § 54-125a (b) (2), as applied to the petitioner, violates the ex post facto clause is reinforced by the legislative history surrounding the enactment. As the habeas court noted, many legislators who supported the 2013 amendment did so out of concern that the prior version of § 54-125a was too lenient, at least with respect to violent offenders. Those legislators wanted to eliminate risk reduction credit from the calculation of the initial parole eligibility date for violent offenders to ensure that they could not be paroled prior to completing 85 percent of their definite sentences. This legislative purpose bears consideration in the present case for the same reason that the court in Lynce v. Mathis, supra, 519 U.S. 433, reviewed similar legislative history in discussing its decision in Morales. In Lynce, the court considered

⁷ We note that the respondent also argues that there is no ex post facto violation because the petitioner was advised by his attorney prior to entering his plea that he was required to complete 85 percent of his sentence before becoming eligible for parole. We reject this claim. In applying the ex post facto clause, our concern is not with what the petitioner may have been told at the time of his plea or sentencing but, rather, with the law applicable at the time he committed his offenses. As the Appellate Court has stated, “for a law to violate the prohibition [of the ex post facto clause], it must feature some change from the terms of a law in existence at the time of the criminal act. That feature is entirely sensible, as a core purpose in prohibiting ex post facto laws is to ensure fair notice to a person of the consequences of criminal behavior. As . . . the United States Supreme Court [has explained], laws that impose a greater punishment after the commission of a crime than annexed to the crime at the time of its commission run afoul of the ex post facto prohibition because such laws implicate the central concerns of the ex post facto clause: the lack of fair notice and governmental restraint when the legislature increases punishment beyond what was prescribed when the crime was consummated. Weaver v. Graham, [supra, 450 U.S. 30].” (Emphasis added; internal quotation marks omitted.) Petaway v. Commissioner of Correction, 160 Conn. App. 727, 731–32, 125 A.3d 1053 (2015), cert. dismissed, 324 Conn. 912, 153 A.3d 1288 (2017).

330 Conn. 462 DECEMBER, 2018

485

Breton v. Commissioner of Correction

it relevant that the retroactive change to the parole eligibility rules at issue in Morales was not intended to prevent the early release of prisoners. Specifically, the court in Lynce stated: “[The court] concluded [in Morales that] the change at issue had neither the purpose nor the effect of increasing the quantum of punishment. Whether such a purpose alone would be a sufficient basis for concluding that a law violated the [e]x [p]ost [f]acto [c]lause when it actually had no such effect is a question the [c]ourt has never addressed. Moreover, in Morales, [the court’s] statements regarding purpose did not refer to the purpose behind the creation of the original sentencing scheme; they referred instead to the question whether, in changing that sentencing scheme, the legislature intended to lengthen the inmate’s sentence. To the extent that any purpose might be relevant in this case, it would only be the purpose behind the [new statute]. Here, unlike in Morales, there is no evidence that the legislature’s change in the sentencing scheme was merely to save time or money. Rather, it is quite obvious that the retrospective change was intended to prevent the early release of prisoners convicted of [murder related] offenses who had accumulated overcrowding credits.” (Emphasis added.) Id., 444–45. It is similarly clear that the 2013 amendment to § 54-125a (b) (2) was intended to prevent the early release of certain offenders and not to conserve time or resources.

It is true, of course, that only a relatively small percentage of inmates—namely, those inmates who, like the petitioner, are incarcerated for committing a violent crime between 2011 and 2013—will be affected by our holding today. Moreover, the only relief to which those inmates are entitled is parole consideration prior to completion of 85 percent of their sentence; whether to grant parole at that time is a decision that remains solely within the broad discretion of the board. But

486

DECEMBER, 2018 330 Conn. 486

Garner v. Commissioner of Correction

the ex post facto clause safeguards the right of those inmates to such consideration regardless of whether they are granted parole at that initial hearing. Accordingly, the petitioner is entitled to the relief he seeks.

The judgment is reversed and the case is remanded with direction to render judgment for the petitioner.

In this opinion the other justices concurred.

CHARLES GARNER v. COMMISSIONER OF CORRECTION
(SC 19927)

Palmer, McDonald, Robinson, Mullins and Kahn, Js.*

Syllabus

The petitioner, who was convicted of certain violent crimes that he had committed in 2012, sought a writ of habeas corpus, claiming that his counsel rendered ineffective assistance at his sentencing hearing and that a 2013 amendment (P.A. 13-3, § 59) to the statute ([Rev. to 2013] § 54-125a) governing parole eligibility, as applied retroactively to him, violated the ex post facto clause of the United States constitution. The legislature had passed legislation in 2011 that permitted certain inmates to earn risk reduction credit toward a reduction in their sentence, at the discretion of the respondent, the Commissioner of Correction, and that also allowed the application of that credit to accelerate the date on which an inmate convicted of certain violent offenses would become eligible for parole under § 54-125a, which, before the 2011 legislation, did not occur until such inmate completed 85 percent of his or her sentence. The 2011 legislation was in effect when the petitioner committed his crimes. Under the 2013 amendment, the risk reduction credit no longer could be applied to advance the initial parole eligibility date of a violent offender, such as the petitioner, and, thus, the petitioner was required to complete 85 percent of his sentence before becoming eligible for parole, regardless of any risk reduction credit that he may have or would continue to earn. The petitioner claimed that the 2013 amendment, as applied to him, violated the ex post facto clause because it retroactively increased the amount of time that he would be required to serve before becoming eligible for parole. The habeas court rejected the petitioner's ex post facto claim, concluding, inter alia, that the risk

*The listing of justices reflects their seniority status on this court as of date of oral argument.

330 Conn. 486 DECEMBER, 2018

487

Garner v. Commissioner of Correction

that the petitioner would suffer a longer period of incarceration as a result of the 2013 amendment was too remote because an award of risk reduction credit is discretionary and any such credit may be revoked by the respondent for cause at any time. The habeas court also rejected the petitioner's claim that his counsel rendered ineffective assistance by failing to arrange for the petitioner's cousin, B, to speak on his behalf at his sentencing hearing, concluding that the petitioner did not establish that counsel's performance was either unreasonable or prejudicial. The habeas court rendered judgment against the petitioner, and the petitioner, on the granting of certification, appealed. Held:

1. The 2013 amendment, as applied retroactively to the petitioner, violated the ex post facto clause of the United States constitution, and, accordingly, the habeas court's judgment was reversed with respect to that claim; the petitioner's ex post facto claim was controlled by this court's decision in Breton v. Commissioner of Correction (330 Conn. 462), in which the court addressed precisely the same ex post facto claim that it did in the present case, and in which the court concluded that the ex post facto clause prohibited the respondent from applying the 2013 amendment to violent offenders who, like the petitioner, committed their offenses between the effective dates of the 2011 legislation and the 2013 amendment because the 2013 amendment clearly altered the calculation of when such offenders are eligible for parole by eliminating risk reduction credit from that calculation.
2. The petitioner could not prevail on his claim that his counsel provided ineffective assistance by failing to arrange for B to speak on the petitioner's behalf at the sentencing hearing; counsel's performance was not deficient because B's testimony, which would have delineated the petitioner's difficult childhood, his good character and work ethic, and the fact that the petitioner's crimes were completely out of character, would have been cumulative of the mitigation evidence already before the sentencing court, including information contained in the memorandum to aid in sentencing, the petitioner's mental health evaluation, and several letters that had been submitted by the petitioner's family members and friends in support of the petitioner.

Argued February 21—officially released December 4, 2018

Procedural History

Amended petition for a writ of habeas corpus, brought to the Superior Court in the judicial district of Tolland and tried to the court, Fuger, J.; judgment dismissing the petition in part and denying the petition in part, from which the petitioner, on the granting of certification, appealed. Reversed in part; judgment directed.

488 DECEMBER, 2018 330 Conn. 486

Garner v. Commissioner of Correction

James E. Mortimer, assigned counsel, for the appellant (petitioner).

Steven R. Strom, assistant attorney general, and Sarah Hanna, assistant state's attorney, with whom, on the brief, was George Jepsen, attorney general, for the appellee (respondent).

Opinion

PALMER, J. Following his guilty plea to certain violent crimes that he committed on March 22, 2012, the petitioner, Charles Garner, was sentenced to a lengthy prison term. Thereafter, he commenced this habeas action against the respondent, the Commissioner of Correction, claiming that a 2013 amendment to General Statutes (Rev. to 2013) § 54-125a; see Public Acts 2013, No. 13-3, § 59 (P.A. 13-3), codified at General Statutes (Supp. 2014) § 54-125a;¹ which eliminated risk reduction credit awarded pursuant to General Statutes § 18-98e²

¹ General Statutes (Supp. 2014) § 54-125a provides in relevant part: "(b) (1) No person convicted of any of the following offenses, which was committed on or after July 1, 1981, shall be eligible for parole under subsection (a) of this section: (A) Capital felony, as provided under the provisions of section 53a-54b in effect prior to April 25, 2012, (B) murder with special circumstances, as provided under the provisions of section 53a-54b in effect on or after April 25, 2012, (C) felony murder, as provided in section 53a-54c, (D) arson murder, as provided in section 53a-54d, (E) murder, as provided in section 53a-54a, or (F) aggravated sexual assault in the first degree, as provided in section 53a-70a. (2) A person convicted of (A) a violation of section 53a-100aa or 53a-102, or (B) an offense, other than an offense specified in subdivision (1) of this subsection, where the underlying facts and circumstances of the offense involve the use, attempted use or threatened use of physical force against another person shall be ineligible for parole under subsection (a) of this section until such person has served not less than eighty-five per cent of the definite sentence imposed. . . ."

² General Statutes § 18-98e provides in relevant part: "(a) Notwithstanding any provision of the general statutes, any person sentenced to a term of imprisonment for a crime committed on or after October 1, 1994, and committed to the custody of the Commissioner of Correction on or after said date, except a person sentenced for a violation of section 53a-54a, 53a-54b, 53a-54c, 53a-54d, 53a-55, 53a-55a, 53a-70a, 53a-70c or 53a-100aa, or is a persistent dangerous felony offender or persistent dangerous sexual offender pursuant to section 53a-40, may be eligible to earn risk reduction credit toward a

330 Conn. 486 DECEMBER, 2018

489

Garner v. Commissioner of Correction

from the calculation of a violent offender's initial parole eligibility date, as applied retroactively to him, violates the ex post facto clause of the United States constitution,³ because, under the version of § 54-125a in effect when he committed his offenses, he was entitled to have any such credit that he had earned applied to advance his initial parole eligibility date. The petitioner also claimed that defense counsel in his criminal case rendered ineffective assistance by failing to provide the sentencing court, Alexander, J., with certain evidence in mitigation of his sentence. The habeas court, Fuger, J., rejected the petitioner's ex post facto claim, concluding, inter alia, that the risk that the petitioner would suffer a longer period of incarceration as a result of the 2013 amendment was too remote because an award of risk reduction credit is discretionary and any such awarded credit may be revoked by the respondent for cause at any time. The habeas court also concluded that the petitioner could not prevail on his ineffective assistance claim because he did not establish that counsel's performance was either unreasonable or prejudi-reduction of such person's sentence, in an amount not to exceed five days per month, at the discretion of the Commissioner of Correction for conduct as provided in subsection (b) of this section occurring on or after April 1, 2006.

“(b) An inmate may earn risk reduction credit for adherence to the inmate's offender accountability plan, for participation in eligible programs and activities, and for good conduct and obedience to institutional rules as designated by the commissioner, provided (1) good conduct and obedience to institutional rules alone shall not entitle an inmate to such credit, and (2) the commissioner or the commissioner's designee may, in his or her discretion, cause the loss of all or any portion of such earned risk reduction credit for any act of misconduct or insubordination or refusal to conform to recommended programs or activities or institutional rules occurring at any time during the service of the sentence or for other good cause. If an inmate has not earned sufficient risk reduction credit at the time the commissioner or the commissioner's designee orders the loss of all or a portion of earned credit, such loss shall be deducted from any credit earned by such inmate in the future. . . .”

³ Article one, § 10, of the United States constitution provides in relevant part: “No State shall . . . pass any . . . ex post facto Law”

490

DECEMBER, 2018 330 Conn. 486

Garner v. Commissioner of Correction

cial. On appeal,⁴ the petitioner challenges both of these determinations by the habeas court. Although we reject the petitioner's ineffective assistance claim, we agree that the ex post facto clause bars the respondent from applying the 2013 amendment retroactively to the petitioner. Accordingly, we reverse in part the judgment of the habeas court.

The following undisputed facts and procedural history are necessary to our resolution of the petitioner's appeal. In the early evening of March 22, 2012, the petitioner arrived at the home of the female victim, his former next-door neighbor whom he had known since childhood, to watch television with her. After spending the evening with the petitioner, the victim asked him to leave because she wanted to go to sleep. The petitioner then struck the victim on the head with a kitchen chair, knocking her unconscious and causing fractures to her eye socket and cheekbone, injuries that required the victim to undergo facial reconstruction and plastic surgery. Before fleeing, the petitioner stole money, credit cards and jewelry from the victim's home.

The petitioner was arrested several days later, and, on September 18, 2012, in accordance with a plea agreement, he pleaded guilty under the Alford doctrine⁵ to one count of assault in the first degree and one count of burglary in the first degree. He was represented by Attorney William O'Connor. Under the plea agreement, the state agreed to a sentence not to exceed twenty years of imprisonment. The petitioner retained the right

⁴ The petitioner, on the granting of certification, appealed from the judgment of the habeas court to the Appellate Court, and we transferred the appeal to this court pursuant to General Statutes § 51-199 (c) and Practice Book § 65-2.

⁵ Under North Carolina v. Alford, 400 U.S. 25, 91 S. Ct. 160, 27 L. Ed. 2d 162 (1970), "[a]n individual accused of [a] crime may voluntarily, knowingly, and understandingly consent to the imposition of a prison sentence even if he is unwilling or unable to admit his participation in the acts constituting the crime." Id., 37.

330 Conn. 486 DECEMBER, 2018

491

Garner v. Commissioner of Correction

to argue at the time of sentencing that a portion of his sentence should consist of a term of special parole.

At the petitioner's sentencing hearing on November 29, 2012, the state recommended that he receive the maximum sentence of twenty years of imprisonment. The state based its recommendation on the petitioner's criminal history, the severity of the assault, the petitioner's prior failure at rehabilitation, his "feigned remorse" for his actions, and a lack of compelling mitigation evidence. The victim also gave a statement to the sentencing court in which she discussed her twenty-nine year relationship with the petitioner, explaining that they first met when she and her husband moved next door to the home where the petitioner resided with his parents. The victim further explained that, although the petitioner had been a child with "impulse control problems and anger management issues" that ultimately led to criminal activity, she always endeavored to support him, and did so up to and including the evening of the attack, when he arrived at her door ostensibly seeking company and conversation. After describing the petitioner's assault on her and the medical and related challenges it had created, the victim implored the court to impose the maximum sentence. The victim's son also addressed the court, and he, too, requested that the petitioner receive the maximum sentence.

The petitioner's attorney, O'Connor, presented the court with certain mitigation evidence, including the presentence investigative report, a memorandum to aid in sentencing prepared by a social worker employed by the Office of the Public Defender, and a mental health evaluation of the petitioner prepared by Andrew W. Meisler, a clinical and forensic psychologist. Each of these documents detailed the significant challenges that the petitioner had faced throughout his life, which included an alcoholic, physically abusive father, various mental health diagnoses including schizoaffective disorder, an instance of serious sexual abuse as a child, a lifelong struggle with addiction to alcohol and drugs, and difficulty maintaining employment. O'Connor also submitted several letters of support for the petitioner written by friends and family, all of whom described the petitioner as a kind and decent person whose attack on the victim was out of character and undoubtedly the result of his untreated mental illness. Although supporters of the petitioner attended his sentencing, none spoke on his behalf.⁶

492

DECEMBER, 2018 330 Conn. 486

Garner v. Commissioner of Correction

Before imposing the petitioner's sentence, the court noted, first, that it had considered all of the sentencing materials that the parties had submitted. The court then discussed the "extremely violent" nature of the assault on the victim and the fact that the petitioner had inflicted violence on someone who had shown him compassion throughout his life. The court also disagreed with the petitioner's counsel and family members that the petitioner had never "displayed a degree of violence in the past," observing that, before the attack on the victim, the petitioner had exhibited "at least [a] propensity or proclivity to engage in conduct that creates a serious risk of injury to person" Finally, the court expressed concern about the petitioner's "long history of . . . criminal conduct" and failure to comply with the treatment recommendations of various mental health professionals, including his failure to take the psychotropic medications that had been prescribed to him. In light of these considerations, the court sentenced the petitioner to a total effective prison term of eighteen years followed by two years of special parole, a sentence the court deemed necessary to protect society and to ensure that the petitioner's "rehabilitative efforts"

⁶ When the court inquired whether anyone wished to speak on behalf of the petitioner at the sentencing hearing, O'Connor responded that "[t]here are people here to support him, but they do not wish to speak"

330 Conn. 486 DECEMBER, 2018

493

Garner v. Commissioner of Correction

are “strictly supervised in a correctional setting and then by special parole.”

The following additional facts, which are set forth in the companion case of Breton v. Commissioner of Correction, 330 Conn. 462, A.3d (2018), also released today, are relevant to the petitioner’s ex post facto claim. “In 2011, before the petitioner committed his offenses, the legislature passed No. 11-51 of the 2011 Public Acts (P.A. 11–51), § 22, codified at General Statutes § 18-98e. Section 18–98e (a) provides that certain inmates who were convicted of crimes committed on or after October 1, 1994, ‘may be eligible to earn risk reduction credit toward a reduction of such person’s sentence, in an amount not to exceed five days per month, at the discretion of the Commissioner of Correction’ In addition, in 2011, General Statutes (Rev. to 2011) § 54–125a (b) provided that a person convicted of a violent crime was ineligible for parole until such person served at least 85 percent of the definite sentence imposed. The legislature amended that provision in 2011 to allow the application of ‘any risk reduction credit earned under the provisions of [§ 18–98e]’; P.A. 11-51, § 25; to accelerate the date on which a violent offender would become eligible for parole. Accordingly, when the petitioner committed the offenses for which he is imprisoned, earned risk reduction credit was to be applied by the respondent both to reduce the length of a violent offender’s sentence and to advance his or her initial parole eligibility date. . . .

“In 2013, after the petitioner was sentenced, the legislature again amended § 54-125a (b) (2), this time by removing the phrase ‘less any risk reduction credit earned under the provisions of [§] 18-98e.’ P.A. 13-3, § 59. Thus, under the 2013 amendment, violent offenders are still eligible to earn risk reduction credit to reduce their definite sentence, but that credit is no longer applied to advance their initial parole eligibility date. Consequently, when P.A. 13-3, § 59, became effective on July 1, 2013, inmates convicted of a violent offense thereafter were required to complete 85 percent of their definite sentence before they became eligible for parole.” (Citation omitted.) Breton v. Commissioner of Correction, supra, 330 Conn. 466–67.

On May 16, 2016, the petitioner filed an amended petition for a writ of habeas corpus, alleging that O’Connor had provided ineffective assistance of counsel by failing to arrange for the petitioner’s cousin, William J. Brathwaite, Jr., to speak on his behalf at his sentencing hearing.⁷ The petitioner also claimed that the 2013 amendment to General Statutes (Rev. to 2013) § 54-125a (b) (2), as applied to him, violates the ex post facto clause because the amendment retroactively increases the amount of time he is required to serve before becoming eligible for parole.

At his habeas trial, the petitioner testified in support of his claim of ineffective assistance of counsel that, prior to sentencing, he had provided O’Connor with the names of several individuals who he believed would be willing to write or address the court on his behalf, including his cousin, Brathwaite. The petitioner further testified that Brathwaite had told him that he would be willing to attend the sentencing hearing and to speak on the petitioner’s behalf, and that he had expected O’Connor to arrange for Brathwaite’s attendance.

During his testimony at the habeas trial, Brathwaite explained that no one from O’Connor’s office ever contacted him and that he would have attended and spoken at the sentencing hearing if he had known about it.

⁷ The petitioner also claimed that O’Connor had provided ineffective assistance by failing to advise him regarding the availability of sentence review and to pursue such review on his behalf. The habeas court rejected this claim, and the petitioner has not raised that claim on appeal from the habeas court’s judgment.

330 Conn. 486 DECEMBER, 2018

495

Garner v. Commissioner of Correction

Brathwaite further testified that the petitioner was raised primarily by his sister and “had a . . . really lousy childhood [due to] a largely absentee father who forbade most contact with his mother. . . . [H]is father’s upbringing . . . was extremely violent, and he visited that upon his family, and his attitude was, I survived it—you know, now you have to, too.” Brathwaite also testified that the petitioner had lived with and worked for him for many years prior to his attack on the victim and that, during that period of time, the petitioner was an exemplary employee and was otherwise “fully functional.” According to Brathwaite, the petitioner appeared normal, conversant and lucid in the days before the offense, and his attack on the victim was “completely out of character for him.”

O’Connor also testified and stated that the petitioner knew that the court, in accordance with the petitioner’s plea agreement, would impose a twenty year sentence but that the petitioner would have the right to argue that a portion of that sentence should consist of a term of special parole. O’Connor further explained that, prior to sentencing, he had informed the petitioner’s family that it was extremely important that they obtain letters of support for the petitioner to present to the sentencing court. Five such letters ultimately were submitted to the court on the petitioner’s behalf.

Finally, in support of his ex post facto claim, the petitioner presented the testimony of Michelle Deveau, a records specialist with the Department of Correction (department), who testified that, although discretionary, risk reduction credit is awarded by the respondent routinely and that each month, the department’s computer system automatically posts it to the timesheets of eligible inmates. The petitioner also adduced testimony from Heidi Palliardi, a supervisor with the department’s Sentence Calculation and Interstate Management Unit, who explained that the petitioner has been and remains fully eligible for risk reduction credit and that, at the time of the habeas trial, already had earned 192 such credits. She also testified that earned risk reduction credit is subject to forfeiture, in the discretion of the respondent and after notice and a hearing, for failure to comply with institutional rules. It is undisputed, however, that the petitioner has been awarded all of the risk reduction credits for which he was eligible up to the time of the habeas trial, and there is nothing in the record to suggest that the petitioner was unlikely to continue to earn such credit.

496

DECEMBER, 2018 330 Conn. 486

Garner v. Commissioner of Correction

The habeas court rejected both of the petitioner's claims. With respect to the ineffective assistance claim, the court found that O'Connor had appropriately "reached out to the petitioner's family members to rally their support . . . at the sentencing" and that his failure also to contact Braithwaite was in no way unreasonable. More specifically, the court stated that "[t]here was nothing presented at the habeas trial that was new or substantively different from what was presented to the sentencing court" and that Braithwaite's habeas trial testimony was merely "repetitive or duplicative" of "what was presented to the sentencing court in letters from the petitioner's family members." The habeas court also concluded that the petitioner had failed to establish an ex post facto violation because, inter alia, the risk that the petitioner will suffer increased punishment as a result of the 2013 amendment to General Statutes (Rev. to 2013) § 54-125a (b) (2), the necessary predicate to his ex post facto claim, is entirely speculative due to the fact that the award of risk reduction credit is discretionary and the fact that such credit may be revoked by the respondent at any time for cause.

On appeal, the petitioner claims that the habeas court incorrectly determined that he had failed to establish his ineffective assistance claim because there is a reasonable probability that he would have received a lesser sentence if Brathwaite had addressed the court on his behalf. In particular, he contends that Brathwaite's statement to the court would have "humaniz[ed]" him in ways that the other mitigation evidence did not, and that it also would have "[cast] doubt" on the state's characterization of him as "strung out on drugs and searching for . . . drug money" at the time of the offense. With respect to his contention under the ex post facto clause, the petitioner reasserts his claim that there is a sufficient likelihood that the 2013 amendment to General Statutes (Rev. to 2013) § 54-125a, if applied to him, would result in a later parole eligibility date than would be the case upon application of the version of § 54-125a in effect when he committed the crimes for which he is now imprisoned.

330 Conn. 486 DECEMBER, 2018

497

Garner v. Commissioner of Correction

I

EX POST FACTO CLAIM

The petitioner's ex post facto claim is controlled by our decision today in Breton v. Commissioner of Correction, supra, 330 Conn. 462, in which we address precisely the same ex post facto claim as we do in the present case and conclude, contrary to the determination of the habeas court, that the ex post facto clause prohibits the respondent from applying the 2013 amendment to General Statutes (Rev. to 2013) § 54-125a (b) (2) to violent offenders who, like the petitioner, committed their offenses between the effective dates of the 2011 and 2013 amendments to that statutory provision. See id., 478. The ex post facto clause prohibits the retroactive application of laws, including laws governing early release and parole eligibility, that impose a more onerous punishment on a defendant than the laws in existence at the time of the commission of the offense. Id., 470, 472–73. As we explain in Breton, "it is unconstitutional to apply a statute that alters, to the defendant's disadvantage, the terms under which eligibility for

498

DECEMBER, 2018 330 Conn. 486

Garner v. Commissioner of Correction

[parole] is calculated, if that statute was enacted after the date of the underlying offense” (internal quotation marks omitted) id., 473; and “it cannot reasonably be argued that the 2013 amendment to General Statutes (Rev. to 2013) § 54-125a (b) (2) does not alter the calculation of when [the petitioner] is eligible for parole It clearly does so by eliminating risk reduction credit from that calculation. Indeed, the petitioner has consistently earned the maximum number of risk reduction credits that were available to him, and the respondent has provided no reason to believe either that the petitioner will be denied risk reduction credit in the future or that any credit that he earns or already has earned is likely to be revoked. In such circumstances, it strikes us as quite speculative to conclude that the petitioner’s release date will not be adversely affected by retroactively applying the 2013 amendment to him.” (Citation omitted; emphasis in original; internal quotation marks omitted.) Id., 478. Accordingly, we agree with the petitioner that the 2013 amendment to General Statutes (Rev. to 2013) § 54-125a (b) (2), as applied retroactively to him, violates the ex post facto clause.⁸

II

INEFFECTIVE ASSISTANCE OF COUNSEL

The petitioner also asserts that the habeas court incorrectly concluded that O’Connor did not render

⁸ We note that the habeas court also concluded that the petitioner could not prevail on his ex post facto claim, first, because the 2011 amendment to General Statutes (Rev. to 2011) § 54-125a; see Public Acts 2011, No. 11-51, § 25; was never intended to apply to violent offenders, and, second, because mandating that the respondent apply risk reduction credit to advance the petitioner’s parole eligibility date would require the court to “enmesh itself” in matters of prison administration that are exclusively within the province of the respondent. Neither of these reasons is meritorious. As we explain in Breton; see Breton v. Commissioner of Correction, supra, 330 Conn. 469 n.5; the court’s first reason is belied by the plain language of the 2011 amendment to General Statutes (Rev. to 2011) § 54-125a, and the court’s second reason fails because the necessarily broad discretion afforded prison officials in the area of prison administration does ineffective assistance by virtue of his failure to arrange for Brathwaite to speak on the petitioner's behalf at the sentencing hearing. According to the petitioner, if Brathwaite had addressed the court, there is a reasonable probability that the petitioner would have received a lesser sentence. We disagree.

330 Conn. 486 DECEMBER, 2018

499

Garner v. Commissioner of Correction

"The issue of whether the representation that a defendant received at trial was constitutionally inadequate is a mixed question of law and fact. . . . As such, the question requires plenary review unfettered by the clearly erroneous standard. . . .

"The sixth amendment [to the United States constitution] provides that in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to the effective assistance of counsel.⁹ . . . Under the two-pronged . . . test [set forth in Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 687, 104 S. Ct. 2052, 80 L. Ed. 2d 674 (1984)], a defendant can . . . prevail on an ineffective assistance of counsel claim [only] if he proves [both] that (1) counsel's performance was deficient, and (2) the deficient performance resulted in actual prejudice. . . . To demonstrate deficient performance, a defendant must show that counsel's conduct fell below an objective standard of reasonableness for competent attorneys. . . . To demonstrate actual prejudice, a defendant must show a reasonable probability that the outcome of the proceeding would have been different but for counsel's errors." (Citations omitted; footnote added; internal quotation marks omitted.) Davis v. Commissioner of Correction, 319 Conn. 548, 554–55, 126 A.3d 538 (2015), cert. denied sub nom. Semple v. Davis, U.S. , 136 S. Ct. 1676, 194 L. Ed. 2d 801 (2016). It is well established that a not include the discretion to apply our laws in violation of an inmate's ex post facto rights.

⁹ This right is made applicable to the states through the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment to the United States constitution. See, e.g., State v. Vega, 259 Conn. 374, 386, 788 A.2d 1221, cert. denied, 537 U.S. 836, 123 S. Ct. 152, 154 L. Ed. 2d 56 (2002).

500

DECEMBER, 2018 330 Conn. 486

Garner v. Commissioner of Correction

criminal defendant's right to the effective assistance of counsel includes the right to have counsel conduct "a thorough investigation of the defendant's background" in order that evidence in mitigation of punishment may be uncovered; Williams v. Taylor, 529 U.S. 362, 396, 120 S. Ct. 1495, 146 L. Ed. 2d 389 (2000); and the United States Supreme Court repeatedly has held that counsel's failure to perform such an investigation constitutes deficient performance. See, e.g., id.; see also Porter v. McCollum, 558 U.S. 30, 40, 130 S. Ct. 447, 175 L.Ed.2d 398 (2009) ("[t]he decision not to investigate did not reflect reasonable professional judgment").

Applying these principles to the present facts, we agree with the habeas court that O'Connor was not deficient in failing to arrange for Brathwaite to attend and speak at the petitioner's sentencing. This is so because, as the habeas court explained, Brathwaite's testimony was wholly cumulative of the mitigation evidence already before the sentencing court. For example, Brathwaite's testimony regarding the petitioner's difficult childhood mirrored the information contained in the memorandum to aid in sentencing and in the mental health evaluation, both of which apprised the sentencing court about the petitioner's troubled past in considerably more detail than Brathwaite's habeas testimony.¹⁰ Likewise, Brathwaite's testimony vouching for the petitioner's good character and work ethic and ¹⁰ For example, the memorandum to aid in sentencing provided that the petitioner "already started 'behind the eight ball' when he was born, as he was born into an abusive and mentally challenged family. His mother was clinically depressed, and his father was an alcoholic who was physically and emotionally abusive to every family member. Before he knew the difference between right and wrong, he was sexually molested by a stranger in the public library." That memorandum further provided that the petitioner "started off drinking at the very young age of eight after being 'pushed' [in]to drinking by his father and a group of his father's friends." The petitioner's substance abuse also was discussed in his mental health evaluation, in which it was noted that the petitioner began drinking alcohol at the age of five, smoking marijuana at the age of thirteen, and using cocaine at the age of fifteen.

330 Conn. 486 DECEMBER, 2018

501

Garner v. Commissioner of Correction

his explanation that the conduct at issue was completely out of character were entirely repetitive of the sentiments expressed in the several letters that were submitted in support of the petitioner. For example, the petitioner's sister, Yvette Garner, wrote that the petitioner is "an amazing man who is kind, loving, caring . . . and generous to a fault." Two of the petitioner's cousins, Valerie Braithwaite and Cheryl DeSorbo, similarly described the petitioner as "a caring, kind, friendly man who enjoys spending time helping family and friends." Ann LeBlanc, a family friend, wrote that she was "very shocked" to learn of the petitioner's attack on the victim, explaining that the crime was not at all consistent with the "caring and thoughtful" person she knew the petitioner to be.

Thus, the record fully supports the determination of the habeas court that one more attestation to the petitioner's good character and troubled childhood would not have made any difference to the sentencing court, such that it simply was unnecessary for O'Connor to call on Braithwaite to speak on the petitioner's behalf at the sentencing hearing. Indeed, the sentencing court expressly rejected the claims of defense counsel and the petitioner's family that the petitioner's attack on the victim was out of character, concluding, instead, that the sentence imposed was necessary to ensure that the petitioner would not harm anyone else and would receive the mental health treatment he required in a "strictly supervised . . . correctional setting and then by special parole." The petitioner's ineffective assistance claim therefore must fail.

The judgment is reversed with respect to the petitioner's ex post facto claim and the case is remanded to the habeas court with direction to render judgment granting the petition as to that claim; the judgment is affirmed in all other respects.

In this opinion the other justices concurred.